

Planning for Upcoming Voice Chats on DeWitt's Epicurus and His Philosophy

Post by "Cassius" of July 31, 2018 at 8:41 AM

Cassius Amicus Here is a paragraph from Chapter 10 about how Epicurus' view of desires differed from both Plato and Aristotle, including: "Freedom, however, is not a right but an achievement; it consists of maintaining and retaining control of experience under all circumstances." We've recently had comment in the group about "involvement in politics" and we regularly see comments asking about the possibility of "Epicurean communities" in the modern world. There aren't many opportunities today for people interested in Epicurus to work together to discuss implementation of Epicurean lifestyles, so I hope you'll consider taking advantage of a few minutes to communicate with other fans of Epicurus and join us for this and future online get-togethers.

He avoids the terminology of both Plato and Aristotle. He has nothing to say about harmony between the parts of the soul nor anything about the mean in virtues. The new context which he sets up for the component ideas has already been mentioned in other connections. Happiness is the natural consummation of life; to be happy man must possess freedom. Freedom, however, is not a right but an achievement; it consists in maintaining and retaining control of experience under all circumstances.

He avoids the terminology of both Plato and Aristotle. He has nothing to say about harmony between the parts of the soul nor anything about the mean in virtues. The new context which he sets up for the component ideas has already been mentioned in other connections. Happiness is the natural consummation of life; to be happy man must possess freedom. Freedom, however, is not a right but an achievement; it consists in maintaining and retaining control of experience under all circumstances.