Yes those other translations are a reminder that there is something in addition to time that Epicurus is considering, but it does not jump out at me with clarity what that something is. It's almost like he is talking about how much of the body and mind is engaged in that pleasure as it is occurring.

Now saying that, it might seem logical to conclude that Epicurus is saying that pleasures that grip both the mind and the body are more "intense" than those that grip only one of the two.
