Not from my reading. The original specifically says "And Epicurus in On Choices says as follows..." Then gives the quote.

I didn't mean to dispute that the texts present this as a quote, just to point out that it is Diogenes Laertius presenting it out of context, so more than just relying on him to present it accurately, we're relying on him to have judged the context correctly.

t "pleasures would never differ from one another" (KD 9)

That's a good one to remember in this context.

Still ... there must be a significant reason this description exists.

To me, the issue of its being a response to Plato holding that pleasure could not be continuous is more than sufficient to justify its existence.

Lots of good deep thinking in this thread so thank you again to all who are putting time into it.
