I'll restate the same point Don made --- Joshua made some outstanding points in this episode that simply would not be possible to make without having dived into a lot of background reading. Joshua always brings an encyclopedic knowledge of general literature to the table, but in this case the cross-referencing of Books One and Two, and the reading far enough to find Aulus Gellius, are just things that aren't going to happen for the general reader no matter how well intentioned.

To repeat my "joke" I will say that this is why we pay Joshua so well for his input --- 😊 In this case I hope the payment in satisfaction from knowing how much his work is appreciated is good enough!
