

Emotional states from an epicurean pov

Thanks Cassius, I think you've provided some interesting insight.

I particularly liked what you said about:

Quote

I see Epicurus as an ACTIVIST, as a scientific researcher and "crusader" for more pleasure and less pain, and not as the kind of stoic-like personality who is concerned primarily with controlling reactions to things that we resign ourselves to be out of our control.

I hadn't considered this perspective and I think it is really interesting.

I also had not thought that this article was reflective of the viewpoint of what Eoghan was posting against rather than for. So for me I have some useful angles to further explore.

Thanks
