Quote from Cassius

I am not willing to write off as impossible a theory that would be based on the mind (brain, presumably) being able to receive stimulation from outside which is not visible to the eyes, ears, etc.

Well, I'd begin by saying there's all kinds of things that stimulate our minds that are "not visible to the eyes, ears, etc." We can't see sounds. We can't see chemical molecules that we can taste. We can't see speech that implants concepts in our minds that can affect our actions. But these are all physical things in a material universe. That's the import of what Epicurus was expounding. There's no supernatural divine inspiration that affects our minds. It's all physical. That's for me the import of the eidola. At least in some respects.
