Quote from Don

Chomsky and others believe the structures of language and deep grammar are hardwired.

This goes to the question "what are the prolepseis?" This is actually where I've been going with this and maybe it belongs in another thread.

I interpret this quote as referring to a faculty of "pattern recognition" with which we learn language. In my quote in post #21 I was referring to Lucretius' description of the development of language (hopefully I'm remembering it correctly). Could it be that that process of developing language is another function of pattern recognition?
