

Foundations 003 - "Thus The Living Force of His Soul Won The Day."

Post by "Cassius" of August 2, 2021 at 9:30 AM

Thus the living force of his soul won the day. On he passed, far beyond the flaming walls of the world, traversing the immeasurable universe through mind and spirit.
(Lucretius Book 1, Line 62)

This passage makes a couple of points worth considering, starting with these:

1. "The living force of his soul" - Not his "reason" or his "logic," though those were no doubt part of the picture.
2. "Won the day" - Can be considered as a conqueror; definitely not a waste of time or ultimately futile.
3. "Far beyond the flaming walls of the world" - Presumably means his survey reached beyond "our world" (which the Epicureans considered to be our system of earth and visible stars, while thinking that there are innumerable other similar systems beyond ours). The "flaming walls" is an interesting reference too.
4. "The immeasurable universe" - Regardless of what modern physics may or may not say about that, concluding that the universe as a whole is without end played an important role in Epicurus' thinking -- thus there are no supernatural gods "outside" or "beyond" it, because there can be no "outside" or "beyond" due to the conclusion that the universe is

Thus The Living Force Of His Soul Won The Day. concerned with

Thus the living force of his soul won the day.
On he passed, far beyond the flaming walls of the world, traversing the immeasurable universe through mind and spirit.

(Lucretius On The Nature of Things, Book 1, Line 62)

EPICUREANFRIENDS.COM