No, the opposite. The source, the pathē, is the same but our experience of it is different in different parts of the mind/body, over different durations and, depending on how one interprets the Greek, due to varying intensities.

Oh! In reading your post again, I think we're using source in two different ways. I was using it as the action that elicits the pathē. You're using source to mean the pathē, the sense of pleasure itself.

Do I interpret your post correctly? If so, that might change my calculus too.
