Quote from Joshua

How should we go about determining how widespread Epicureanism was in Antiquity?

The proper question is: How should we go about determining that there was any philosophy more widespread than Epicureanism?

Is there any inscription larger than that of Oinoanda? Or was there any Roman library found other than focusing on Epicurean philosophy? Historians hoped to find traces of early Christianity in Pompeii. What did they find nearby? "I will be faithful to Epicurus, according to whom it has been my choice to live." Inside of a magnificent building, inhabited by the rich and influential.
