There are many points we are going to need to discuss for this podcast and I will probably move the "images" posts to that thread when it is set up.

For now I want to mark another topic which hits near the end of the episode: We were discussing something like: "To what extent was the "Nihilism" viewpoint (as we think of it today) represented in a school or segment or philosopher in the ancient world?"

I will probably set up a separate thread for that too over time but feel free to make comments on that here. We need to discuss what "nihilism" really means in order to unpack that too. Martin came up with the name of Russian philosopher (I will make no cultural cracks that he was Russian 😊 ; more seriously the problem is very deep across the entire modern world.) whose name I had never heard of as one of the earliest prominent names associated with nihilism - I will have to come back to add that here.
