

Is the Natural and Necessary Question Objective or Subjective?

I've always maintained that the desires are subjective barring the most basic of essentials of survival. This is something that's often misleading, and newer learners of the philosophy struggle with, both as a teaching method and for didactic self-application. In order to teach the desires and their categorization examples are given for each category, I think this might be a key culprit in this pattern.

What's necessary for some may not be necessary for others and what is unnatural may be natural to someone else whether by personal preference, health, or even culture.
