Yeah, I think this approach is fascinating and likely correct, though it is still sort of niche by contrast to the old-guard 'computational' model of the mind. You find more extended mind folks among evolutionary biologists. I hadn't really thought about it with respect to Epicurus, but it would be cool to look at the text. It's possible that his views about living together outside of town are in some sense indicative of how he thinks the environs affect thought, for example.
