

The dangers of dialectical logic

Post by "DavidN" of January 26, 2024 at 7:55 PM

The concept of value devoid of subject is just a play at universalism. Fun fact I failed my ethics class because I refused to admit that there is any truth to universalism, there's too many paradoxes and real world examples to which universalism simply fails, and I tore apart every argument my professor made for an entire semester, had I discovered Epicurus at the time I would have had even more powerful arguments to throw back at him. Morality can't exist without a subject because it is wholly a human artifact, and can only be applied properly to humanity. You can't apply human morality to lions and gazelle, even dolphins which are arguably the next closest to sentience engage in rape, but can you apply human morality to what is still a wild animal. So the subject not only matters but is essential to the moral argument.