

Dealing With Electric Grid Disruption

Post by “Cassius” of May 11, 2024 at 4:34 PM

Quote from Julia

I suggest we agree on “Time will tell, and until then, let's agree to disagree.” I will read your reply, but I won't reply in-turn to keep in line with the “no contemporary politics” rule; I feel like I've already overstepped the mark on that.

This sounds like a good plan. I don't know that the discussion has already gotten over the line of the “no contemporary politics” rule, but we'll all be better off if we talk mostly about the immediate personal dangers posed by potential emergencies and how to respond to them, rather than the policy issues that may lead to those issues.

Most of what would be productive to discuss could just as easily be attributable to “normal” acts of mother nature as much as anything else.

I do suggest at some future point that Epicureans consider getting together to produce an escape plan when the final end of the earth appears imminent (as Lucretius discusses will occur at some point) but unless some of us are extremely well positioned in a space program, we probably are just as well off leaving that for another day as well.