Which in a sense is everyone who's on the forum. Well played!

In a very strong sense. The purpose and benefit of the forum is to allow us to communicate with and be inspired by like-minded people. There are many other regular contributors who could have been listed, and I would name Kochiekoch and Patrikios and DaveT and Eikadistes and Pacatus and Raphael Raul among them.

Further, there are those who do not post regularly in public, but who either by private conversation or simply by showing up regularly on our recent visitors list let us know that they are interested in what the forum is doing. In this last group I won't try to name names but they know who they are.

But I do want to single out Eikadistes for special mention. Among all of us who pursue Epicurean philosophy, Eikadistes is the one who has set up his own website, prepared very substantive original materials, published them, and generally become an independent source of Epicurean learning. There are many different approaches among those of us who are really "into" the study of Epicurus. What Eikadistes has done in pursuing an independent path without unnecessary negativity about the path of others is an example that deserves special consideration for what all of us might do in our own ways.
