I was just ready to post this, when I saw the link Cassius posted to the other FAQ. It mentions the self-refutation argument, which I think is important. Anyway...

Whether causal determinism is true or false from the perspective of an outside observer...from the human point of view, we must necessarily choose between various courses of action. We cannot not choose.

Even if someone believes that free will is an illusion, that person nevertheless is acting (and must act) as if he had free will.

To deny free will is a performative contradiction.
