

Proposition: It is Not Primarily the "Science" of Epicurus That Should Impress Us, But Rather The "Perspective" On Science, Or, If You Will, The "Limit" On Science, That Is His Major Achievement.

As I see it, my process is to pragmatically accept as fact those things which have no evidence to the contrary, such as a fully material universe (and thus no absolute morality)

while leaving open for study those aspects which are unclear, such as cosmology. I won't reject any theories that fit available data as wrong just because of a concept I have-- but there's no theory fitting available data that has any supernatural or ideal realm in it, so Epicurus is still on very solid ground with the observation that absolute morality is nonsense.
