Cassius,

Thank you for the reply. It is a thrill to be able to discuss these points with those who have given thought to how to live and think consistently with epicureanism. Your points are productive and I value them.

I have invested much time exploring the question of free will, and have unfortunately spent a couple of years lost in the wilderness of this topic. However, I have developed a view that I believe is consistent with my overall philosophical principals: since it is not possible to be conscious of lacking free will, the absence of free will does not have direct relevance on how we live.

The fact that that the question of free will has been discussed for millennia, does make me feel like my perhaps over-simplified view may have a huge blind spot. To the extent that the question of free will is interesting to you I welcome any further thoughts.
