

Meme Creativity Requested!

Post by "Cassius" of October 22, 2021 at 1:15 PM

Creativity Request: I saw the top part of this meme below today, and although I feel like it is a little unfair to the Russians, even more, I feel like it cries out for extension to "Epicurean" and "Stoic" panels. What do you think would be good? It would be very easy to just say "I will die for a friend" or "I will die for pleasure" and "I will die for virtue," but I bet we have people who are far more creative and funny, especially combined with the right image. So if you have a chance, please let us know your suggestion, preferably with an image!

(PS I suspect we will all immediately think - this is perfect for @Nate - but I bet - at least over time - others would have good ideas too!)

American literature: Russian literature

Epicurean literature:

Stoic Literature:

---

Post by “Cassius” of October 22, 2021 at 1:31 PM

I have to say - the picture choices are just perfect. Except maybe for the American -- the weird expression on his face fits with the humor of the whole meme, but I don't even know who that is (?)

---

Post by “Marco” of October 22, 2021 at 1:54 PM

I think an epicurean would not die for something abstract like love, a country or honour. The greatest good is life.

---

Post by “Cassius” of October 22, 2021 at 3:36 PM

Quote from Marco

I think an epicurean would not die for something abstract like love, a country or honour. The greatest good is life.

Now that causes me to think of changing not only the noun but the verb -- " I will live for pleasure." might be one way of contrasting it ironically -- too bad we don't have any big smiling faces of Epicurus!

---

Post by “Martin” of October 22, 2021 at 5:01 PM

The American is Jack London.