

Upgrading the Lexicon To A Full Wiki

Post by "Cassius" of June 13, 2024 at 5:39 PM

Over the years we have made sporadic use of the "Lexicon" function of the forum software, but we've never used it to its full potential as a "Wiki."

Today we invested time in making the Lexicon a first-class aspect of the forum by drastically reorganizing it and beginning the process of featuring it as the EpicureanFriends Wiki.

It's now listed in the top menus as and various other locations as the "Wiki,"

For those of you who have used the Lexicon in the past all of the old material is still there, though perhaps rearranged under different categories.

The software has always had collaboration abilities, in which we can designate users as co-editors, and also built-in tracking of revisions. But the key to making it more user-friendly will be to produce a wiki-like front page describing its contents, and the first version of that is here:

144

Right now the front page is just a reworked variation of the "Getting Started" material, but I'll continue to work on trying to make it more useful by incorporating paragraphs about the basics of the philosophy and where to locate information about it in the forum.

As always suggestions and contributions are welcome!