

A little lesson on death in the supermarket...

It is pretty much a given that all people at some point question their mortality and worry about death.

In the local supermarket this afternoon I was "witnessed" too by a missionary. I guess his assignment after service was to hit up the market for converts. After his usual pitch, I asked him if he was scared to die. Of course he said no. He was in the great number of saints. Then I asked him what if he died and there was no immortal existence, and all of the missionary work pointed to a great nothing? He looked upset and said, then I would have wasted my life.

I calmly said, I rest my case. Smiled and before I walked off, I told him death is nothing to us. We have no recall of life before birth. Death is the same way. No sensation. Don't fear it. Live today.

Great exchange! Whether he admitted it or not, no doubt you reminded him of First Corinthians 15:

I am not sure, but I believe he quoted that and other sundry verses. I just cut to the chase.

Depending on how sympathetic the person is who is involved, this statement by Paul is true, and it is so very sad. These people gear their whole lives on a fraud which will never come true for them.
